

The Inside-Out Prison Exchange Program®

Social Change Through Transformative Education

The Inside-Out Prison Exchange Program® facilitates dialogue and education across profound social differences – through courses held inside prison, involving students from a higher education setting and incarcerated students.

These courses ignite enthusiasm for learning – encouraging participants to find their unique voice and to consider how they can make change in the world.

More than a program...
Changing the world...

credit: Ryan Brandenburg

Inside-Out began as one class in Temple's C.J. Department in 1997 and has become an international program of transformative education. More than 1,300 educators have been trained in the Inside-Out methodology, with 60,000 inside and outside alumni worldwide.

credit: Ryan Brandenburg

The core of Inside-Out is a semester-long weekly course through which 15 undergraduate students and the same number of incarcerated students attend class together inside prison. All participants read a variety of texts and write several papers; during class sessions, students discuss issues in small and large groups. In the final month of the course, students work together on a class project.

Inside-Out

"Most college courses are lectures and readings which, later on, we are supposed to apply to real-life situations.

This class was a real-life situation itself... The students in the class gave it life – we taught each other more than can be read in a book."

For more information on Inside-Out,

visit <https://insideoutcenter.org>

insideout@temple.edu

Lori Pompa, Founder and Executive Director

Inside-Out classes have been offered at Temple University since 1997. Contact the Criminal Justice department advisor for more information.

Founded and based at

